Your contribution at work

Your public role

You keep promises and take responsibility for results. At work, Saturn in the 8th house highlights shared resources, risks and crises. Your approach through Mars in the 10th house centres on responsibility, leadership and public work. You renew systems and make room for unusual ideas. In a meeting, you notice who actually takes ownership once the discussion ends. Volunteer for a defined piece of work whose result you can present yourself. Establish who makes the decision and what a useful outcome looks like before you start. After the presentation, write down two questions people asked you. They show where colleagues already trust your judgement. Use that evidence to ask for a more demanding brief with clear authority. Give your manager a concise account of what you delivered and who benefited from it.

How you work

Sun in the 12th house puts research, quiet focus and work behind the scenes at the centre of your work. You get stalled projects moving. You need a visible result. Allow time to do the work properly. You like making the first move. Agree clear handovers afterwards. For a new brief, make a small working trial first. Give it one morning and show the result to its eventual user. Record which assumption survived the test before you commit the rest of the week to a larger version. When colleagues keep stopping at your desk with quick questions, agree a regular time to talk them through. They get useful answers and you keep your concentration. Judge the working day by what you completed. Reserve your strongest hours for the task that needs your judgement, then deal with messages together.

People and practice

Your best boss / best team

Mars in the 10th house points to a task involving responsibility, leadership and public work. You renew systems and make room for unusual ideas. In a dispersed project team, you need access to the people holding crucial information. Ask to join a short technical discussion with future colleagues. Notice whether objections receive answers and whether everyone can find the resulting decision afterwards. Agree what colleagues should write down at each handover. A decision, an owner and a date save more effort than another agreeable meeting. Look closely at whose work receives recognition in pay reviews. Your contribution needs to be visible to the person who controls the budget.

What you build slowly

The practical brief behind Saturn in the 8th house concerns shared resources, risks and crises. You keep promises and take responsibility for results. Take responsibility and delegate tasks. Choose a task where repeated practice produces real skill. It could be the difficult invoice you check every month or the client call you gradually learn to lead. After each attempt, record one mistake that cost time and one decision that worked well. Ask an experienced colleague for feedback on that specific point. You will develop a standard of quality you can explain and repeat. When you take on extra responsibility, agree the authority and payment that come with it. Bring examples of this growing skill to your next pay review.

Money, energy and extra income

How you earn best

You make information clear and connect people. Mercury in the 12th house gives you a particular interest in research, quiet focus and work behind the scenes. You get stalled projects moving. If you interpret between specialists and customers, count the follow-up questions you prevent. Explain which documents and discussions your proposal includes. Price the complete package and set a limit on consultation rounds before the client accepts the work. In employment, collect equally concrete evidence: hours saved, mistakes prevented or contracts won. Take those figures to your pay review. When someone adds a regular duty, discuss the new scope immediately. Keep a record of what was agreed so that useful extra work receives a proper place in your role.

What wears you out

Saturn in the 8th house directs your attention towards shared resources, risks and crises. You keep promises and take responsibility for results. Be thorough and hand work over on time. A working theme for Pluto in the 6th house is work routines, care and daily practice. You find the root cause and handle difficult conversations. An unfinished handover follows you home when nobody knows what remains open at the end of a shift. Reserve ten minutes to write down each outstanding item, its next action and its owner. Repeated interruptions need a conversation about how the work is organised. Show your manager a real brief and the points where you lost time. Agree one change for the following week, then check whether it gave you more uninterrupted working time. Put a definite finish in your calendar and let colleagues know who covers urgent questions afterwards.

Your chart's side hustle

Offer a 60-minute presentation rehearsal for €75: ask a local society about its next talk and include 30 minutes of preparation in the package. Start with one customer who already knows what they need. Send a short proposal with a delivery date and one revision included. Record materials and travel separately. After the handover, count the paid hours including preparation and the client call. Use that figure to set the next package price. Give the offer one fixed slot in your week and accept another booking after the first invoice has been paid. This gives the extra work a manageable place alongside your main job and shows which requests pay for the effort involved.
